The dream, of course, made a deep impression on her mind, but as months were away and nothing came of it, she regarded it more and more as "only a dream." But one day last fall a letter reached Anamesa, directed to her. Some one who knew he caused it to be directed to this city. It happened so that she was absent on a visit at that time, and after remaining in the Sringfield post office a while, it was returned to Iowa. Her friends there then enclosed it in another envelope and sent it here again, and it finally reached her as she was at work in

On opening it she nearly fainted. It was from her first husband! from whom or of whom not a slip had been heard stated that he was in the wilds of Texas, following the hazardous life of a ranchero. He had left home with the determination of never returning until he had made good his shattered fortunes. Several times he had so far redeemed his vow that he was on the point of seeking his family and friends, when some turn of the wheel of fortune had dashed him back to poverty. At length, the fickle goddess had favored him and he was rich again. Whether his wife was living, whether she was the mother of an other man's tamily, and a host of other questions asked, she hastened to answer.
